Creating Your Personal Earth Action Plan

Dear EcoGirl: Suddenly green information is everywhere, and I try to do what I can, but I'm so busy. How can I prioritize my actions for the earth? Signed, Focusing in Forestville

Dear Focusing: I'm delighted that so many mainstream periodicals are finally catching "green fever."

Still, it can be a little overwhelming to hear about environmental issues in so many fragmented pieces. With scattered tips, celebrity stories, and ad claims galore, it can sometimes seem like green is just one more obligation to fit into our already-stuffed schedules.

So, rather than give you yet another list of possible actions, I want to try something different today and encourage you to step back and uncover your own personal approach to this topic. I think this will help you both prioritize and feel more excited about the impact you can have.

Your Four Key Questions

I invite you to find a moment and write your answers to these questions. They'll form the basis of your ongoing Personal Earth Action Plan.

(1) GRATITUDE: "How does the earth bless my everyday life?" Feel the joy of remembering the many beautiful ways that the earth is the foundation of our daily lives. Through nature's magical processes, we get air to breathe, food to eat, children to love, warming sunshine, nurturing rains, countless delightful experiences, and indeed the mystery of life's journey at all. Sometimes crises can help us recognize what's most valuable. I invite you to simply feel the earth's blessings.

(2) VISION: "What change in the earth's condition do I most want to see?" Allow yourself to connect to your heart's dreams. Which earth crises do you most hope will shift positively in the coming years?

Perhaps you want to see global warming reversed, avoiding the effects of rising sea levels and disrupted weather patterns. Or maybe you want the richness of the world's diverse creatures and cultures to be preserved. Perhaps you have fond memories of family fishing trips and want that for your child too. Or maybe you feel the nurturing wisdom and solace of intact ecosystems and want to retain this essential balm for our aching souls.

Write down or draw your positive vision, and hold it as your inspiration and starting point. Feel the pleasure of remembering how much you care!

(3) FRAMEWORK: "In what ways would I love to weave earth action into my daily life?" Even if you're already including the earth in your actions, step back and imagine what form you'd most love this to take. You don't have to be passive to others' suggestions. Identify what sounds fun and rewarding to you!

For instance, do you want to create new activities or adjust your current ones? Increase your socializing or your time alone? Be indoors or out? What gifts or resources would you like to offer, whether practical, creative, or mystical? What needs do you have, such as saving money?

You can reclaim your power around this topic, even with just a few hours a month. Remember that our actions together truly will affect what is to come. And everyone's unique contributions are needed!

(4) IMPLEMENTATION: "What are some tangible ways I can act for my vision?" With your new perspective, seek and gather action ideas that serve both the earth and your life. Prioritize those most meaningful to you.

You can get input through newspapers, magazines, friends, talks, the Internet, and brainstorming. Consider ways to add green to what you do at home, work, school, and play. Connect with others who also care about the earth, for mutual encouragement. Share green activities like gardening or beach cleanup with children and friends. Support the groups working on your key issues, to amplify their results. Feel the satisfaction that comes from honoring the earth by ensuring that its structures continue.

Along your journey, keep your Personal Earth Action Plan handy, to help remember and refine your priorities. Also please share with me how this approach works for you. I hope that it helps people joyfully co-create our culture's timely transformation.
